Today is my mum's birthday so HAPPY BIRTHDAY mum! Unfortunately I was a bit late with the card and Greek post being what it is (Greek public services in general, in fact, after the 'help' from the Troika/ 'restructuring' measures...) it will probably never get there at all...thanks for that! Anyway, my mum is great, a truly generous and caring person who looks out for others, like taking the old ladies who live next door to the market and as well as feeding most of Athens' stray cats that have hung out on the backdoor step for the last 20 years (not the same ones, obviously). She's also very talented musically and can sing, play instruments and sight read and harmonise in ways that I now realise (having also joined a choir) are pretty special. And she has always accepted me as I am, never tried to convince me to get a 'real' job or a bloke, which is just as well because neither look particularly likely at this point in time...

Error. I am making an error. Speaking in error. An error of syntax. I talk too much. The voice is saying. Too much information. Too quickly.

To regain pure language fully formed from the linguistic flux was the tremendous and only capacity of translation. In this pure language which no longer meant or expressed anything. All information. All sense. And all intention. Would finally encounter a stratum in which they were destined to be extinguished.

I had created my existence as a vast circuit of superficial interactions. Under various pretexts. Some were merely random, I entwined my personal history with others' by feigning common interests, exaggerating professional connections and mutual friendships. My online data was randomised within floods of generic information. Codes within codes. I told personal stories with enough verifiable context to make them sound plausible. I ventriloquised my own voice to the extent that sometimes I myself was not sure which recounted memories were fact and which were
